Fritz shuddered, but repeated the question, this time more loudly. What is the matter? echoed the old man. Nothing is the matter, only that we are merry to-day. The Black Knight has been here, and there will be brave doings by and by! The Black Knight rides in the wood to-night; Beware, beware how you cross his track! Beware of the steed with the hoof so light, For once you have mounted you never ride back! Heaven help me! said little Fritz; the wolves and the forest are better than this! So he turned out again into the dreary night, and dragged his weary limbs a little farther. Only a little farther! He was now utterly exhausted, faint with hunger, half dead with cold and terror. To add to his misery, the snow began to fall thickly. Only let me find a place to lie down and die in, said poor Fritz, for I can go on no longer! Presently he came to a huge snow-drift, piled up against the giant trunks of two enormous trees. The little boy felt very drowsy, and not quite so cold; so he threw himself down wearily, and resigned himself to his fate. He knew that to sleep in the snow was certain death, but he said his childish prayers over, and folded his little hands together, and so dropped off into a heavy slumber with the words upon his lips. And he dreamed. He...
