Purchasers can usually download a free scanned copy of the original book (without typos) from the publisher. Not indexed. Not illustrated. 1887 edition. Excerpt: . . . circuits which the present needs of business and communication require. In other words, I provide for the running in close proximity of circuits for carrying the strongest and most intense currents, as well as those for carrying the most feeble electrical impulses--such as are produced in the operations of telephony--and this in such manner there will be no danger to any circuit from such proximity, while all are brought within ready and easy access. The system comprises main and branch pipes or conduits, in which the conductors are carried in the manner hereinafter specified. The mains consist of three separate and independent pipe-lines, one containing such wires as are required for communication with distant points or other cities, and which will be hereinafter designated as trunk-lines. Another pipe contains the wires of circuits used in local communication and intercommunications--such as telephone-lines, fire and burglar alarm circuits, and the like--while the third contains the circuits used for electric lighting, transmission of power, or those industrial and domestic applications of electricity which require powerful currents. The lines are run through the streets of a city at such a distance below the surface as will insure protection against bending or injuries from repair of the streets, subsidence of the surface soil, and the like. Generally and whenever convenient the lines are run midway between the buildings on either side of the way, and with the trunkline between the other two. At the...
