Excerpt: . . . gentler and more considerate; she, more lenient towards his faults and more earnestly in love with him. The young man smiled as he said: You have such an ex cathedra way of speaking of it, I must conclude that you have given this case your thoughtful attention. May I ask, in a general way, what you think of marriage under circumstances similar to theirs I am not sure that I can give you a very lucid answer. Never having experienced any of the ills of poverty, I am not competent to judge impartially. Speaking individually, I have always congratulated myself on having enough to give a poor man-- provided I should accept such a person. Speaking generally, while I would commend prudence to every ones consideration, I would say that love, and love alone, should determine a man or woman in taking that important step....
